BILL HUNT BOOKS, United States, 2005. Paperback. Book Condition: New. 226 x 147 mm. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Two coming-of-age boys, best friends, one White and the other Black, live extraordinary lives on a Louisiana sugarcane plantation in 1946 . Twelve-year-old Billy tells a subtly funny, emotive and poignant story about his young life as he becomes aware of the social and economic forms of segregation and oppression in the early years following World War II. He finds himself accepted by both sides of a clearly delineated social and racial divide in the small community in Louisiana, at school and church, and on the plantation where his father is overseer. Billy speaks from his conscience, about family and friendships, about a time in Southern history long before the Civil Rights Acts of the 1960s became a reality. When a rare snow storm blankets the area on Thanksgiving Day, he is stunned as he recognizes the great disparity in his life in the Plantation Big House to the deprivation in the lives of his friends in the Plantation Quarters. From that time of stark awareness of the inequities around him, the dirt road and the plantation symbolize the meanness of a way of life essentially unchanged for over two hundred years. His long friendship with his Black friend, Papa, becomes a heart wrenching victim of the times in which they lived. At the heart of this story, lies the sense that a world Billy once considered safe is in fact, dark and dangerous, powered by the persistent evils of segregation, inequality and suppression. (1) With a masterful stroke for time and place, and with the dialect as existed along the back roads in the plantation country of Louisiana in 1946, you ll believe you were...
